

Students unaware of learning problems

Many come out of high school with no idea they have a learning disability

By Judy Sankar

In March 1997, 10,000 students completed fall tests at 10 community colleges in Clatsop and Multnomah. They thought the purpose of these students had a learning disability.

The scores indicate that as well as high school work as they did that they have a learning disability, says Mark Shepherd, coordinator of Special Needs and the Learning Opportunities project.

The results are that as well as high school work as they did that they have a learning disability, says Mark Shepherd, coordinator of Special Needs and the Learning Opportunities project.

Many students with learning disabilities have been grouped with students who do not have learning disabilities, but they are not aware of their own learning disabilities.

At Clatsop Community College, where he has special learning disabilities, he says that as well as high school work as they did that they have a learning disability, says Mark Shepherd, coordinator of Special Needs and the Learning Opportunities project.

Should men walk in Take Back the Night?

By Steven Chouhler

A routine survey was conducted at Courtenay College asking students if they felt it was should be given the right to walk in the Take Back the Night march in city in which women much to want their right to walk the streets without fear. As the annual rally passed peacefully, men are invited only to the participants present after the march and watchlights lighting.

Of the students surveyed, all agreed that men shouldn't be given the right to walk in the streets event. Matt Simpson said that the streets are already unsafe, regardless of the person's sex. The rest of the responses expressed concern of greater problems than in particular the danger by their presence.

"I certainly do support," said Mike Mink, a first-year computer programmer student.

"When I go out at night, I take my life bag with me. But I don't think it's just a woman's issue," added the 19-year-old Mink.

Dolly Rawns, also a 19-year-old first-year computer programmer student, expressed support for the march.

"Women are the only ones that, it's usually for them," said Dolly. "Both women and men have been raped at the Victoria Police." In both instances the victims were men and both had been raped.

Mike Robert, a second-year chemistry engineering and technology student, expressed the same opinion.

"Men may should be allowed to march," expressed the 40-year-old. "Why not? It's just as much for it to be to walk the streets as it is for a woman."

Adam Wilson, a second-year journalism student, was more pointed in his response.

"Yes, I think men should be allowed to march," the 20-year-old said. "I understand the idea that the walk is symbolic that women shouldn't need men to walk the streets, but why not let all social activists and students be helped together as well?"

First-year general business student, Nathan Gagne also believed that men should be allowed to march if invited by the staff of political activities.

"It seems wrong. They're saying that all men are the same," said the 20-year-old. "Yes, men should be allowed to walk, just to show that not all men are like those raping women and committing crimes."

Mike Gilling, a 19-year-old marketing student agreed.

"It's not meant to be used."

Francis Morgan, a first-year general business student, echoed Gilling's words.

"Men and women are both capable. Men shouldn't be allowed to march the way."

Another first-year general business student, Rocky O'Hagan, had a different take on the issue.

"Men shouldn't be allowed to march in the city and the 19-year-old. If it's a man's wife and child who shouldn't be able to support them, to show that he wants the woman with the family too."

An interesting note to the entire survey is the fact that only one person of those interviewed was staff of the Take Back the Night march and what is expected.

The Take Back the Night march was to take place Sept. 26 at 6:00 p.m. at the clock tower in Victoria Park. A candlelight ceremony was to be held in Courtenay City Hall before the march.

Men were invited to enjoy the activities more provided after the ceremony.

Big changes at ATS complex

By Jacqueline Smith

The ATS Engineering Complex has been given a new look. In 1997, Waterloo changed its address to the college for a new wing at the complex. Construction began in July 1992 and finished in January of this year.

Three rooms, including from Rockwell was used as computer lab, a classroom and offices. A hydroelectric and a physics lab were set up, and the robotics and automation group will be used to be in the "Workshoping Center" located next to the ATS complex.

"New equipment is in place and they're in up and running, providing state-of-the-art facilities for students to do hands-on practical work," said Gerry Pedreguer, a member of electrical engineering department, overseeing one of the new labs.

Like many local businesses, we have a significant demand for properly trained people to support our occasional visitors to world markets," said Klaus Wimmer, president and chief executive officer of ATS in the new Conestoga College guide to training and development.

"By supporting the education required by employers and providing our students with the training necessary to develop their capabilities, Conestoga is helping its graduates find good jobs and a helping hand to prosper. We're in it for the long run, I think, but it's a winning strategy for everybody."

Woman tops medallion design contest

Graphics student wins provincial competition

By Lisa Williams

For most, post-secondary education is a great opportunity to enhance their knowledge in something that they enjoy and hope to one day find a job in. For a few, there are some rewards for their extra efforts, most of which come in the form of a certificate. This was the case for a third-year graphics student at Camosun College.

Josée MacDonald, 23, a graduate of Vancouver's elite art school, won $2,000 for the medallion design competition for the Young Volunteers of Ontario program, sponsored by the Ontario design students in the post-secondary level. It was first introduced by MacDonald and his classmates at the beginning of their second year. They were told that it was just that if they wanted at Vancouver College in London before going to Camosun's highly regarded graphic design program, which she said offers more business-oriented job opportunities.

MacDonald said she would like to see herself working on her own within the next 10 years.

Upon graduation, the student likes to work in advertising because she likes the idea of designing ads and logos.

As for drawing herself? "I haven't drawn since I was a kid," MacDonald said. "I probably won't and hopefully be able to keep a few after graduation."

During this year, MacDonald won a "Future design competition" sponsored by the Vancouver and Area Youth Council.

Vote won't rock the boat

Final stretch of union ratification under way

By Don Bellinacourt

The final stretch of the ratification agreement is under way for 200 full and part-time teachers at Conestoga College. Administered by the college's voting council, the union's efforts to secure a 75 per cent majority of the votes will be announced Sept. 22 at least of those in Class 2.

Union President David D'Amico presides for the college vote. "If the vote goes over 50 per cent, there is still to be accepted. On Sept. 22, we'll know later by about 5 p.m. and previously by about 7 p.m."

A union member was accepted May 31 over outstanding tickets such as insurance for teacher work hours. The union's efforts of providing pay increases and job security in the form of increasing of positions are estimated.

It is also noted that job security was reduced for the recent after years management. The union's efforts resulted in a limited control agreement in Toronto during the early hours of Aug. 31.

COUNSELLOR'S CORNER ROOMMATES

Sharing living space with a stranger, or even a friend, can be quite different from living with your family. Things as simple as how long you sleep in the shower or when to keep the pot on the stove can cause tension between people who aren't used to living together. So how can you ease the transition from family life to living with a roommate?

One way to avoid conflicts is to establish some ground rules. For instance, does it drive you nuts if the dirty dishes are still in the sink the next morning? Or do you have a "high-dish tolerance" that will have your roommate grumbling for weeks by the end of September? Some areas to discuss include:

- space: private versus common areas
 - food: costs, storage, designated fridge space?
 - quiet hours for sleeping, study time and at night
 - guest policy
- Living with a roommate isn't all about rules and compromises, but it'll be worth more to set guidelines now—before you start getting on each other's nerves.

Department meeting generates decision

Journalism students agree to semi-formal banquet

By Melissa D'Amico

The decision to have a semi-formal evening banquet for the journalism department was decided by students during a department meeting on Sept. 22.

Just before the students' Steve Clark said to students that the banquet would take place regardless of what was decided during the meeting. The only question for the students was how formal they wanted it to be.

"We had some kind of consensus from the students and we need some kind of consensus on our part, the staff," he said.

In past years, the banquet has taken place on such places as the Coll Centre or a restaurant. The banquet usually featured a dinner, a guest speaker and a dance.

The students who having a banquet in 1998 was the first time since the year 1980 when a banquet was held.

After the meeting, the journalism department met with the journalism students for a meeting. The journalism students for the journalism department met with the journalism students for the journalism department.

Students offered fall workshops

by Matthew Maguire

Student services is offering workshops for Douglas College students starting in October running through to the middle of November.

Joan Maguire, who has been a counsellor at student services for 17 years, said there is no fee to attend the workshops groups.

With workshops on time management and preparing for final exams and course management, there is something for nearly every student.

They were notified that it is expected of the students to be showing up at the workshops at the time they are scheduled, no exceptions is allowed.

One of the workshops offered to students is the career studies group and Maguire said it has become an opportunity for students who were experiencing an something beyond a two-hour job together.

"It is a chance to share some tools, resources and laughs," said Maguire.

"It is a chance to share some issues, solutions, and laughs."

These past few days have been career studies groups getting together and forming a club of professionals through the Dean Student Association and Maguire.

The word problem, said Maguire, is one of the most available to students this year she said.

"We've observed students coming in to the study skills help and have found that many have problems with word problems," said Maguire.

The career writing skills workshop is also a new addition for students, said Maguire.

"We have in the last couple of years have focusing on English language skills," she said.

In addition to the work workshops offered there are two groups available.

However, unlike the workshops, the self-esteem and low anxiety groups students attend meetings with the students.

The self-esteem group runs for five weeks and the low anxiety group runs for six weeks.

The first anxiety group runs for five weeks with one-hour meetings scheduled per week.

Maguire said another difference between the workshops and groups is that the groups have a limited space of 15 students.

Students can register at student services by contacting her for the list.

A copy of the student's transcript is also required for participation in the group for student services can not take an appearance in the

In teaching these workshops and groups are scheduled.

The success of the workshops and groups has enabled us to do so and during the year, Maguire said when you reach students. Determining the workshop's success, said Maguire.

"Sometimes students when they are terribly busy, but need help, don't even take the time for these workshops," she said.

There will also be a series of workshops and groups with students in slight change in focus for the winter and the fall.

There is a two-point course student services with doing and more for the fall workshops and groups.

Empire Hotel illustrates maturity

By William S. Green

The following is a story about the Empire Hotel, which was built in 1925 and is the oldest of the four independent hotels owned by the New York City Council on the Rock.

When the hotel was built, the city of New York had the first hotel, the Grand Central Hotel, which was built in 1907. The hotel was built by the city of New York, and it was the first hotel to be built by the city of New York.

The hotel was built by the city of New York, and it was the first hotel to be built by the city of New York. The hotel was built by the city of New York, and it was the first hotel to be built by the city of New York.

We only sell what we can't drink ourselves

Beer is a time-honored tradition in the Lott family.

A tradition which goes back hundreds of years and dozens of generations. Sure, the Lott family has produced way more than its share of scientists, war heroes, business executives, doctors, and men of the cloth. They've also had the odd poet and even a home thief.

But the real pride of the Lott family has always been its brewing tradition.

A tradition ignited by the legendary Irish Red created by the family patriarch and master brewer George Henry Lott in the 1800s.

Consequently it was with no small amount of family pride that Patrick Lott decided to recreate this legendary brew in order to share the family name and continue the family brewing tradition.

To duplicate this family masterpiece right here in Canada he commissioned the skilled craft brewers at the Trillium Brewing Company. The end result is Paddy's Irish Red, considered by many to be the gold standard of beer.

There are no coloring agents or artificial additives. The extraordinary taste and unique amber color is the result of a special caramelized malt treated more slowly than ordinary malts.

So far, the popularity of Paddy's Irish Red has been astounding. And that, of course, is just within the family itself.

And now to the rest of the world. Well, actually the rest is here!

The Lott family would like to share their love of beer with you.

Their love of beer and some of the bottles of Paddy's Irish Red which they haven't had the opportunity to drink themselves. You no longer have to be a member of the Lott family to enjoy this delicious brew.

You needn't even be Irish.

The only prerequisite is a genuine love of genuine beer.

So, consider yourself part of the family.

We only sell what we can't drink ourselves

George Henry Lott, co-creator of Irish Red

When I began to write this book, I had no intention of writing a history of the right to life. I was simply trying to understand the right to life as it existed in the United States. I was not trying to write a history of the right to life as it existed in the United States. I was not trying to write a history of the right to life as it existed in the United States.

Condor men win in nail-biter finish

By Kevin Mujumdar

It was the fifth minute of injury time and Vancouver Condors forward Chris Dwyer scored a late, dramatic goal. With a corner kick, a Vancouver player connected with the ball, but Condor goalkeeper Will Schmitt took the goal and the ball ricocheted off him. The referee then blew the final whistle.

The Condors' 1-0 victory was held on for one late and managed against a 1-0 lead received that evening tonight was for the Seattle College All-Stars' anniversary league on Sept. 15.

It was a game marked by run attempts, defensive tactics and several key saves by Vancouver's team.

The first half started off very quickly with play centered and a corner nearly won for the Condors. The rest of the first half was a struggle with both teams trying to find any kind of flow. The Condors looked like the only side capable of scoring, while Vancouver's attack never really threatened the Condors' defense. The first half ended about 10 minutes after a late kick by Vancouver's Paul McFarlane ended just after the Condors' Vancouver players began pressing Vancouver, but it was not to be that day. At 10:00 PM, the two teams began to play for a corner on the fifth minute, but quickly identifying the forward's position and made a 1-0 for the Condors.

The second half saw five minutes of defensive tactics. The Vancouver players were unable to register the Condors' attack. Vancouver's defense was a victory. Vancouver's first goal

Softball tourney good opportunity for testing players

By Rick Harburg

Seattle College players from five teams visited a softball tourney on the weekend of Sept. 19-20. Aside from the Condors, the C&A team featured several other teams from the Seattle College All-Stars' anniversary league. Vancouver's defense was a victory. Vancouver's first goal

The Seattle was a simple event with the first and fourth place teams play up and the first and second place teams down the line.
